

Resistance to globalization

MARCELO SAGUIER

Resistance to globalization refers to the gamut of struggles and actions of social groups and individuals in response to the dislocating consequences of neoliberal reforms and its effects in the spheres of the economy, politics and identity/culture.

The expansion of capitalism has historically encountered resistances from social groups affected by its disruptive and disorienting impacts. Yet, it is not until the mid 1990s that the notion of a resistance to globalization enters the language of the social sciences and the mass-media to designate the worldwide upsurge of different forms of social unrest in relation to the dominant policies, institutions and consumerist culture associated with neoliberal globalization.

At least two sets of conditions explain the emergence of a concept of resistance to globalization. First, objective conditions inscribed in the features of global capitalism: the revolution of information technologies; the centrality of a global financial market in all productive activities; the transnationalization of production; the privatization of global commons; the salience of transnational corporations, rising social inequality and ecological degradation. These features account for the interconnectedness of socioeconomic, environmental, cultural and political processes across a global space.

Second, subjective conditions associated with the rise of a global consciousness (Robertson 1992) expressed in an emerging transnational managerial class linked to global production and services (Van der Pijl 1998) and a global resistance movement. In the latter case, such new subjectivities capture a transformed relation between space and time which, in turn, opens possibilities for new notions and practices of citizenship, social mobilization and state power through which market rationalities are distributed and embodied locally (Appadurai 2002).

Both sets of conditions facilitated the awareness that local events are embedded in global processes, thus making global approaches a necessary condition to redress the negative consequences of globalization. In other words, resistance to globalization emerges as a category for thinking and acting in a context of interconnected capitalism.

The concept and the practices of resistance to globalization are shaped as part of dialectical and co-determining processes. A cycle of spontaneous and organized grassroots mobilization begins towards the mid 1990s to express a generalized discontent with the consequences of neoliberal globalization. Demonstrations target symbols of neoliberal globalization such as free trade integration projects, institutions of international economic governance, intergovernmental organizations aligned with a neoliberal ideology and transnational corporations. The shaping of notion of resistance to globalization took place in relation to the wave of large popular protests that captured the attention of the global public opinion.

The rise of the Zapatista Army of National Liberation in Mexico's poorest southern areas in 1994 in response to the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) is often taken as a landmark event in what has come to be a new form global resistance politics. As an indigenous and peasant movement, the Zapatistas resist imposition of a universal model of development advanced by NAFTA and based on the commodification of social life. They succeeded in galvanizing a transnational solidarity movement to voice their local conflict as intimately related with the dynamics of corporate capitalism.

The NAFTA project also led to other dynamics like the tri-national coordination
