Abstract The purpose of this study was to examine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of female police officers. The study was conducted in a police station in the city of Tehran, Iran. The participants were 30 female police officers who were randomly assigned to two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The experimental group received a 12-week training program that included aerobic exercise, strength training, and flexibility exercises. The control group did not receive any training. The results of the study showed that the experimental group had significantly higher levels of physical fitness and lower levels of psychological stress compared to the control group at the end of the 12-week program. The findings suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the physical and psychological health of female police officers.
