INTRODUCTION

THE name of Russ Meyer is one that occupies a place of great significance in the glamour photography field. His definition of feminine pulchritude is familiar to magazine readers, hit and miss, and many of the most beautiful Hollywood stars have paid to his camera.

Born in Oakland, California, Russ' interest in photography began when he received an 8mm motion picture camera when he was 14. All his pocket money went into the purchase of further equipment. His knowledge of cinematography stood him in good stead as a sergeant in the Signal Corps during World War II, where he did considerable action in Europe. After the war, he worked for and wrote an industrial documentary documentary in San Francisco. His growing interest in still photography led him to purchase the Graphic, which he used to photograph wedding.

An ardent buddy and well-known magazine photographer in Dents, suggested that Russ try his hand on shooting glamour photography. Meyer followed that advice and has never regretted it. He abandoned his motion picture work and busied himself with 8mm work and the new field. Sales were slow at first but after the arrival with Golden Photos, the West Coast picture agency to use his way to making a name in the world of glamour photography.

Russ Meyer's wife, Eve, whom he married about the time, also became the growing ground for his photography in the beginning. Because of her photogenic appeal, picture sales began to increase. They now live and work in Hollywood. A long string of other glamour women, both models and actresses, have had their features portrayed to him by Meyer over the years and he is now fairly popular in his profession.

Although he has used cameras up to and including 8 x 10, he now prefers to work mainly with 35mm equipment. He still maintains that motion picture work and from time to time, the credit has to come in cinematography.
