Global Health Evidence Evaluation Framework:

Global Health Evidence Evaluation Framework U. S. Department of Health and Human Services, Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, 2013-04-04 The global community has collaboratively taken responsibility for advancing health for all and codified this commitment in the Millennium Development Goals The global effort has enabled standardization of approaches including the agreement that evidence based decision making is a norm for health policy practice and programs The U S Agency for International Development USAID is likewise committed to evidence based innovative efficacious effective and sustainable global health programs Evidence based decision making is critical to informing and guiding programming in global health intervention global health policies and programs However many current evidence evaluation frameworks have evolved from the clinical model where physician decision making is determined by rigorous systematic review of data derived from randomized clinical trials RCTs which emphasize efficacy for the individual patient Evidence requirements for global health programs are complex and include three streams efficacy at the individual level effectiveness at the population level and sustainability at the host country level A standardized approach to evaluation of evidence will strengthen and support global health strategies programs and practice optimizing limited resources for maximal health impact The Global Health Evidence Evaluation Framework project is aimed at developing an evidence framework for the purposes of informing efficacious effective sustainable global health programs at the community and scale level This project represents collaboration between the project team and an interdisciplinary group of experts called the Technical Expert Panel or TEP Each key step of the project requires both preparatory work on the part of the project team and then consideration and discussion by the TEP with synthesis of the TEP discussion and decisions then made by the project team Preliminary Key Questions were What is the role of context in the effectiveness and scalability of global health interventions programs at the community and population level What descriptions of elements of study design and execution are necessary to reach conclusions about effectiveness What descriptions of elements of implementation are necessary to reach conclusions about scalability and sustainability The six steps of the project are to 1 Assemble an interdisciplinary panel of experts 2 Select a set of exemplar interventions or programs Note exemplar means characteristic of its kind These exemplars are needed because they provide the real world examples to use when developing and testing frameworks and criteria 3 Perform a focused literature review on the exemplar interventions to elucidate what is currently being reported regarding evaluations of the exemplar interventions and to identify gaps in the evidence 4 Perform an assessment of strengths and limitations of existing frameworks for assessing global health interventions 5 Identify and or develop of criteria to meet identified needs or gaps in existing frameworks 6 Pilot test the draft criteria

Global Health Evidence Evaluation Framework Paul G. Shekelle, Margaret Maglione, Jill Luoto, Breanne Johnsen, Tanja R. Perry, Southern California Evidence-Based Practice Center/RAND, 2013 OBJECTIVES The Global Health Evidence Evaluation Framework project is aimed at developing an

evidence framework for the purposes of informing efficacious effective sustainable global health programs at the community and scale level

DATA SOURCES Literature search of published and gray literature input from a multidisciplinary Technical Expert Panel

TEP METHODS With input from the TEP we identified six existing evidence frameworks for public health global health interventions or programs and applied these frameworks to the evidence bases for three exemplar interventions chosen to represent a diverse set of global health programs or interventions household water chlorination prevention of mother to child transmission of HIV and lay community health workers to reduce child mortality

Review of the findings with the TEP identified an important gap as the reporting of information about the implementation of the intervention or program

We identified three existing criteria sets for implementation reporting and selected from them 10 criteria that covered areas identified by the TEP

We pilot tested these 10 criteria on three published articles of effectiveness for each of the three exemplar interventions

RESULTS Assessing the same body of evidence yields different conclusions regarding strength of evidence depending on which framework is used some of which were extreme with the same evidence base assessed as strong in one framework and low quality in another framework

All frameworks focus on efficacy and or effectiveness with most attention going to the allocation method of study participants to the intervention randomization versus other method in assessing study quality

Many fail to consider implementation issues and none explicitly assessed costs or sustainability at the community or scale level

Incorporating insights from the frameworks for implementation criteria helped to address some of these gaps yet our pilot test of 10 implementation reporting criteria on nine published studies showed great variability both within and across studies

Some criteria were classified as having good reporting in almost all studies criteria about the setting of the study the characteristics of the recipients and the mode of delivery of the intervention or program while others were reported on rarely or never the rationale for the intervention the costs of the intervention an assessment of the population needs and two criteria about barriers and facilitators of the implementation

Similarly two articles had good or fair documentation for greater than 75 percent of criteria while three articles had poor or none documentation for more than 50 percent of criteria

CONCLUSIONS Existing frameworks for the assessment of public health evidence do not deliver key pieces of information to inform best practices for community and large scale global health programs with the lack of information about implementation and sustainability being an important identified gap

In a pilot study our application of existing criteria for the reporting of implementation information shows great variability within and across published global health intervention studies

The reporting of implementation information using criteria that have broad support across diverse stakeholders and that can be reliably assessed would provide policymakers a stronger evidence base upon which to make decisions
