Marketplace Timothy Havens, 2006-10-02 What television viewers around the world watch often depends less on popularity or government policies than on the personal relationships between buyers and sellers in the international programme market A few thousand acquisitions and distribution professionals decide what programmes the earth s inhabitants can watch and who can watch them This book provides an inside look at the cultural assumptions and business practices of these television merchants It argues that the market in television programs responds principally to institutional needs rather than to the wishes of the viewing public or the skills of television s creative artists Leaving aside conventional questions about the production contexts textual strategies or popular reception of entertainment television worldwide this project trains its focus on the business practices of global television sales in order to provide a lucid overview of the diversity of firms business practices and programming genres present in international television. Consequently, this volume provides the first comprehensive portrait of the operations of the international television business, the people who work in the business, and the ideas that circulate among these businesspeople. Such a portrait is crucial to any theoretical treatment of television globalisation, since international television executives determine global television flows in the first instance based on their own understandings of the economics of the business and the preferences of their primary audiences.

Rethinking Television Formats Sharon Shahaf, 2018-09. Over the last two decades, television formats have been at the crux of a radical transformation in global television. The new environment created by the rise of the format trade is characterized by an extraordinary increase and intensification in the sources, directions, and volume of exchange of new televisual concepts or formulas. One of the most notable changes in this new marketplace is the rise of small players in locations that were inherently marginalized and isolated in the old world of television. Rethinking Television Formats focuses on the unlikely Israeli turn of fortune in the era of the global format to tell a wider and alternative story about the very nature of formats. In tracing Israeli television's rise to be a leader in designing and distributing globally tradable innovative televisual concepts, this book explores the deeper reasons that allowed formats to so radically transform long-held hierarchies in the global television system.

Planet TV Lisa Parks, Shanti Kumar, 2003. Provides an overview of the rapidly changing landscape of global television, combining previously published essays by pioneers of the study of television with new work by cutting-edge television scholars who refine and extend intellectual debates in the field.

Understanding Television Andrew Goodwin, Garry Whannel, 1995.

Here Is Television Thomas H. Hutchinson, 2015-08-04. Excerpt from Here Is Television: Your Window to the World. The author of this book has helped to shape the beginnings of television, the newest of the instruments available to those in the future who seek to inform the minds of men or to win their sympathy and understanding. It takes imagination and daring to leave the security of a known medium to explore through trial and error with tools which are often anachronisms as soon as used a new medium which has a limited audience, no traditions, no certainties of technique. It was in part this same imagination which led the author to teach what was perhaps the first University class in Television Programming. Offered by the Washington Square Writing Center of New York University in the fall of 1940, this course has been conducted each semester since that time, with the exception of a brief period during the war, and this volume is an expansion of these lectures, discussions, and demonstrations. It is of special interest that this book grows out of teaching and will be widely purchased and used as a textbook. With television admittedly in its infancy as an industry and as an art form, why it may be asked, should we presume to teach the techniques of television programming? The answer is that we have a tradition of demanding that our best doctors, artists, and scientists shall teach us who seek to follow in their steps. Happily, most creative people are genuinely interested in helping us to share whatever secrets of technique or knowledge they possess. Moreover, the wisest of them realize that teaching benefits both him who learns and him who teaches. The task of communicating what one knows or has done is in itself clarifying We do not have knowledge in its fullest realization until we have attempted to express it to communicate it to others Thus it is fortunate that when we as students seek to benefit from what pioneers in any field have learned knowledge itself is perfected in the very process of teaching About the Publisher
