Abstract: In the present work, we describe an extended flood risk analysis carried out in the Adige River basin in Italy. The methodologies adopted were used in a comparative approach that highlighted the limits and potentiality of some methods with respect to others. Principles presented may be considered of interest for general problems of flood risk management. The work carried out shows interesting results along with a broad number of specificities that may constitute a useful support for those who will apply hydrological analyses on large-size basins. The study basin covers a wide area of about 12,000 km². In such a case, a satisfactory analysis becomes complex because of the large number of phenomena involved in flood generation that need to be taken into account.

Keywords: flood risk, water management, flood volume estimation, Adige River

1. INTRODUCTION

Flood risk management is critical for territories that remain vulnerable despite the proliferation of advanced technologies. Population is exposed to higher risks as cities increase their boundaries, neglecting or sometime forgetting about natural river systems. Flood risk management represents a problem that is not easily addressed due to many political, social, and economic factors. In addition, prediction remains difficult because of the numerous mechanisms involved the generation of floods. Moreover, the use of relatively short gauging records, and the uncertainty in the flow rating curves, as well as the errors involved in the measurements of extreme events influence the reliability of flood prediction.
