

Culture Is Not Personality

It is not always easy to distinguish personal behavior from cultural characteristics. In any intercultural encounter, there is always a temptation to feel that the others have bad character or bad intentions, rather than to realize that they are acting according to different rules.

People from individualist cultures may attribute value-based behavior to personal character even more readily, because they are less likely to perceive the invisible hand of the group. They do not like to be categorized as a group, so they seem not unique individuals. They have a hard time seeing that there are both unique individuals and there a common culture with their fellow countrymen and -women. People from collectivist cultures may make the opposite error: they may behave of individuals to a group intention. We saw this happen in the Frankfurt incident, where the collectivist tendency was thought that the United States was behind the harassing treatment inflicted on their diplomat, not merely on actually perceived basis on a direct comparison.

When people are interacting with each other across cultures, their cultural values could make them see or do things that are misperceived as individualistic. Some stereotypes are misattributions from across cultures as a result of seeing things the culture dimensions. Let us give a quick overview of some of these.

In an apparent analogy to the dimensions of culture, thinking also distinguishes the dimensions of culture: extroversion, introversion, agreeableness, and disagreeableness. It is not the place to discuss these "big four" personality traits, but only for caution the reader to be aware of it. The last dimensions from psychology are extroversion and introversion from the five dimensions of human nature.

Misattributions of Culture-Based Behaviors

Person who is culturally more...	... call misperceive culture-based behavior of foreigners as...
Extrovert	insulting, stressed, hostile, rude
Introvert	dishonest, corrupt
High Power Distance Oriented	disrespectful, improper, rude
Low Power Distance Oriented	harsh, rigid (of high-status persons); weak, cowardly (of low-status persons)
Aggressive	aggressive, showing off (of men); playing "hardy doll" (of women)
Non-aggressive	weak (of men); unassertive (of women)
High Uncertainty Avoiding	unprincipled, amoral
Low Uncertainty Avoiding	rigid, paranoid
Individualistic	irresponsible, throwing away money
Collectivistic	stingy, cold

Cultural Differences and Language

Introduction

There are a number of differences in national culture have to do with language differences. We know that each language has its own vocabulary and style, and it is very hard to understand without knowing the finer nuances of meaning and interpretation. Every language has evolved along with the culture it represents. Language differences between countries are related to differences in culture. The reverse is not true, however. It turns out that having the same language and nationality mean sharing the same culture. Countries can differ greatly in culture even though they speak the same language. Take, for example, the case of Belgium and Flanders (Belgium), the neighboring country of Belgium. The last countries share a common language, but they differ in culture, though differing in the Two countries can differ greatly in culture even though their people speak the same language.
