	FOOD & BEVERAGE COST CONTROL

Subject: Food & Beverage Cost Control functions	Page: 1 of 8
--	---------------------

The food and beverage cost control is based on three main principles:

- Organizing and implementing the purchasing, receiving and storing system. Because the raw materials used are economically volatile and perishable, the proper control of quality and value of raw materials is an important factor to achieve the sales goals and profitability.
- Minimizing loss through efficient production
- Standardizing the production method to satisfy the majority of the guest as well as to secure profit levels.

To achieve the principles stated, it is necessary to calculate the cost of products offered in any situation and to manage both the sales and profit. To satisfy this requirement, the food and beverage cost accounting system needs to be established to be one of the main control facets of the hotel.

Food and beverage cost control is aimed to assist each department head in their job to run the operations smoothly and most economically. The report and data prepared by the Cost Controller are to be reported to the Food and Beverage Manager, Executive Chef and the Banquet Manager. For accounting purposes, they are used to calculate Food & Beverage department's cost.

I-Food cost control

A large share of the food and beverage department's revenue comprise food revenue; therefore, it is vital that proper cost control is carried out to secure profit. Because it is impossible to accurately predict what guest will order from the menu, the preparation of raw material is based upon experience and forecasting. As a result, some amount of waste and left over foods cannot be avoided. Long term storage will only reduce the materials' quality as well as create undesirable sanitary conditions, and it will cause waste and rot as a result. However, by reducing the waste to a reasonable level and keeping consumption and loss at a minimum, profit can be obtained.

Food cost control is a mean to decrease waste and serve every food uniformly by carefully planned cooking and standardized cooking procedures.

1. Necessity to standardize

Whether the hotel's restaurant, bar, and banquet receive a good or bad reputation depends on whether the same food is always served with consistent taste, volume, and presentation. That is, the recipes are standardized so that there will not be a difference in taste, volume, and presentation from day to day. Adherence to standardized quantity guarantees uniform service to all guests without being influenced by human factors.
